

PORNOGRAPHY. We describe many depictions of nudity and sex as pornography. The expression has a negative connotation. 'Decent' people reject pornography; at least they profess to do so. This is understandable when such depictions involve coercion and violence, or in any way the degradation of participants. However, to refer to depictions of nudity - or indeed normal sexual activity (heterosexual or homosexual) between consenting adults - in a defamatory way, seems hypocritical; after all sex is an activity most of us engage in with pleasure. Then again, there is no doubt that many such depictions are in poor taste and should be disregarded. But I find it remarkable that many people are more easily affronted by the display of nakedness or sex than that of violence, including authorised violence - such as killing during war; just as some of us tolerate flagrant antisocial behaviour - like racism, white-collar crime, corruption - more readily than pornography. I suspect the bourgeois concern for pornography is a smokescreen for truly obscene acts, such as profiteering, arms dealing, politicians' spin doctoring & fearmongering, nationalistic /patriotic propaganda and religious brainwashing. We can ignore pornography; but we are time and again forcibly exposed to true obscenity.

My Erotic Manifesto

Why erotica? Why erotic art? Why Erotic Photoart? For Sigmund Freud (1856 - 1939), the Austrian neurologist and founder of the psychoanalytic school of psychiatry, the libido or eros, the desire for survival, propagation and sex, was the most important motivating force in life. Richard Holloway, formerly Bishop of Edinburgh, Primus of the Scottish Episcopal Church, Gresham Professor of Divinity, says in his book Between the Monster and the Saint: "The fuck is as fundamental as the fight." (OK, he says it the other way around, in a different context; same thing, though.) So, is sex important? You bet it is. What shall we do about it? Well, one of two things: We may ignore our sex drive and do nothing about it, we even may go so far as to suppressing it (many do, probably for psychological or religious reasons) or we revel in it. I do the latter. I like sex; always have, always will. I am a follower of tantra: Guiltless, artful sex. Not sex for procreation, where women are reproduction facilities - but sex for mutual pleasure. Then sex is a reciprocally joyous occasion, with the tender yet passionate union of a loving couple's two halves; this is sacred sex - without shame or regret.

Sacred as opposed to religious - with its blame, disgrace and sinfulness. Sex that is celebrated, talked about, written about, depicted - sex that is not taboo. My Erotic Photoart is sexy, sensual, artistic and adventurous. However, it does test the boundaries between erotic and pornographic. One definition for pornography is: Anything that is arousing - be it words or pictures - is porn; by that definition my work is pornographic. But the most accepted, most commonplace definition is: Pornography is offensive, derogatory, rude, tacky, demeaning, vulgar, devoid of taste. Then - I believe - my work is not pornographic; but you will have to make up your own mind. When I look at my work, I am aware of its voyeuristic nature. Tantra acknowledges that when we view the nude body, we gain satisfaction ... and in the process indeed become voyeurs. This is an aspect of our nature Erotic Photoart caters for, unashamedly so. I adore eros, the god of love. Eros - according to Plato - is the creative force that inspires art, literature and the sciences. Hence Erotic Photoart, a celebration of the nude female body, of beauty and our sex drive.
