

WAR / PEACE - CONSCIOUSNESS. War-consciousness - the view that wars sometimes are necessary, even useful - pervades our lives. We accept - or are oblivious to - that it is running our world. When we go to the movies, open the newspaper, turn on the tv or play a video game, what we are fed is often steeped in war-consciousness - with the result that many deem war inevitable, acceptable, fascinating, even alluring. In our archives war-consciousness manifests as technical manuals that dwell on engineering feats - or historic documents, in which famous battles are recounted, heroes celebrated and glorified. Countless movies tell the stories of our brave who are winning the fight to preserve our way of life. The message is that the 'just war' is worth the cost. Australia is said to have forged its sense of nationhood at Gallipoli, where young men proved their mettle. The battle was a massacre, but due to entrenched war-consciousness the tragedy has been elevated to a mythical status, with its annual celebration inducing war-imbued nationalism. The media offer documentaries - ostensibly to remember the fallen, but with the added incentive for patriotism and the war spirit being kept alive in the old and generated anew in the young. We are told not to forget. The dead? Well, surely. But why the militarism - the martial parades, the focus on battles? Will evoking past wars, glorifying won or lost fights and turning fallen soldiers into mythical heroes help prevent future wars? History and current events show that it will not. Thus war-consciousness overpowers peace-consciousness, the idea war is always wrong and must be avoided. However, this is what we must strive for; this is what our politics, entertainment and communications should be steeped in. We have to entrench in our minds the notion that our way of life must be preserved by peaceful means, not warfare. The world wars of the twentieth century probably could have been avoided had peace-consciousness been developed during previous centuries; future generations will benefit from the peace-consciousness pacifists advocate this century.

*Peace is easily achieved.
First change the mind.
Then stop the shooting.*

*Once more,
my favourite quote:
"I don't want to just end
the war, I want to end the mindset that got us into war in the first place."
